Summary:

Last June, in the wake of the London Bridge attack, in which three jihadists killed eight and injured 48 armed with 12-inch knives and a van, the prime minister, Theresa May, said it was time for some 'difficult conversations' about extremism.

A year later, and it feels like we have barely even started such a conversation.

Summary:

A slew of convictions should remind us that nihilism lurks in Britain. it's been a long, hot summer - and a busy one for counterterror officials. While the prosecution of the suspect in the attempted car attack in Westminster this month is only starting to get underway, there have been a slew of terror trials and convictions that have quietly concluded these past few months.

Taking far-right extremism seriously doesn't mean exaggerating the threat it poses. Small neo-Nazi grouplets and murderous racist loners are frankly not a comparable threat to a global jihadist movement actively recruiting and inciting British youth.
