Summary:

Rising fundamentalism amongst Muslim youths in Germany is sparking alarm in the nation's schools, with more and more teachers seeking help in dealing with radicalised pupils. Since October last year, a hotline set up by the Federal Ministry for Migration and Refugees (BAMF) has increasingly been inundated [8] with calls from teachers and school mental health workers concerned about Islamic extremism. "Most of the children have grown up in a Salafist environment — that is to say, their parents are radicalised," said Florian Endres, from Nuremberg Advisory Centre on Radicalisation. Domestic intelligence chief Hans-Georg Maassen warned [9] in December that support for radical Islam was at "an all-time high", with the number of Salafists identified by authorities as living in Germany having grown to 10,800 from just 3,700 in 2011.
